Gemma Farrington, Simon Johnson : Assessment of Parents within Care Proceedings before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Assessment of Parents within Care Proceedings:

This book considers the law and practice in relation to applications made within care proceedings for the assessment of children and families in the UK. The main focus is on applications for orders pursuant to the Children Act 1989, s 38(6), but other types of assessment are also examined. The book offers a practical guide to the making and opposing of assessment applications. It includes advice on the preparation and case management of such applications, as well as a detailed and authoritative account of current guidance from the UK's appellate courts on the circumstances in which assessments can/not be ordered. A separate chapter deals with the issue of the funding of such assessments, with particular reference to the position of the Legal Services Commission in respect of payment for assessments out of public funds. In order to provide an essential context to the current state of law and practice in the UK, the book also includes discussion of the legislative and judicial history of s 38(6) and the policy considerations that lie behind the decision to allow assessments to take place. It emphasizes the tension between the wish of parents to have a fair assessment of their capacity to care for their children, set against the imperative need of children for the earliest possible decisions about their future.
